The Beatles walked into EMI's studio at Abbey Road via the goods entrance in 1962. They left it through the front door and across the zebra in 1969. That's a mere seven years, during which time they redefined not just pop music but also fame. They walked in as nonentities. Two years later they were the most famous people on Earth. Two years after that they were so famous they could no ...

The Beatles not only changed music but they affected culture in ways that had not been challenged by a musical group before. I asked my mom what she remembers about the Beatles. She was only 6 when they performed on the Ed Sullivan Show but she still remembers. She said that, "The Beatles didn't define a generation, they created one".

Throughout the second half of the 60s the Beatles functioned as that rare but necessary and important channel, popularisers of esoteric ideas – about mysticism, about different forms of political involvement and about drugs. Many of these ideas originated with Huxley. The Beatles could seduce the world partly because of their innocence.

How the Beatles changed Britain - The British Library
That evening which saw Riley invite John and Cynthia Lennon, George Harrison and Pattie Boyd to dinner at his central London flat would be one of the most pivotal in the history of The Beatles. The evening was a standard dinner party until it all changed shortly after the meal when Riley gave them coffee laced with LSD.

This is how LSD changed The Beatles forever
The 60s were a time for a new wave of counter culture, anti-establishment, and free expression, and The Beatles' use of psychedelic music and spiritual experimentalism in their lyricism allowed the population to thrive off of their music. The Beatles didn't simply revolutionise the music industry, they presented a necessary cultural revelation.

How The Beatles Changed the Music Industry
The Beatles changed so much: the image of Britain, music, culture, fashion, attitudes to class. They made Britain feel a better place and more dynamic, 'swinging' and 'cool' to people across the world. It is impossible to sense, post-Beatles, what Britain was like pre-Beatles. Such is the difference between before and after.

He'd say to George Martin, "I dunno, change it somehow, smother tomato ketchup all over it, flange it." The other, possibly less apocryphal story, involved the invention of the technology itself. By Revolver, the Beatles had begun double tracking most of their vocals, and constantly having to sing the same track twice was wearing on them. To help them out, EMI engineer Ken Townshend came up with the idea of artificial double tracking (ADT).
