When Nietzsche said, "God is dead," he uttered a truth which is valid for the greater part of Europe. People were influenced by it not because he said so, but because it stated a widespread psychological fact. ~Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 145. Jung said that people often confused reality with psychological reality.

I argue that Nietzsche's account of psychology provides the answer: he grounds power's privileged status in facts about the nature of human motivation. In particular, Nietzsche's account of drives entails that human beings are ineluctably committed to valuing power. So Nietzsche's ethical theory follows from his philosophical psychology.
