In many professions, “vulnerability” is considered a weakness. Not so in acting. In performance, a character must be able to reveal their most personal, intimate sides: their motivations, fears, secrets, and habits. This is the true art of acting. Being vulnerable, then, is a sign of strength in an actor. If you’re vulnerable and open about your truth, then you are free to share in a scene’s emotions and relate to the inner struggles of a character.
